
COLLECTION

The Essentials of Applied Psychology

One Unanswered Text, a Thousand Fears

Anxious attachment, reassurance-seeking, and a CBT approach to emotional reactions

Gildas Garrec

CBT Psychopractitioner

psychologieetserenite.com

One Unanswered Text, a Thousand Fears

Gildas Garrec

CBT Psychopractitioner

Éditions Psychologie et Sérénité

© 2025 Gildas Garrec — Psychologie et Sérénité. All rights reserved.

Tell Me You Love Me Again

The anxious man or woman -- what psychology reveals about those who need reassurance

Gildas Garrec

CBT Practitioner

The Essentials of Applied Psychology — Volume 2

Legal Notice

Anxious Attachment — Tell Me You Love Me Again

Copyright (c) 2026 Gildas Garrec

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without the written permission of the author, except in the case of brief quotations in critical articles or reviews.

The clinical cases presented in this book are fictitious. Any resemblance to existing or deceased persons is purely coincidental. Names, circumstances, and details have been altered to ensure confidentiality.

This book is not a substitute for professional therapeutic care. If you are experiencing a psychological crisis, please consult a mental health professional.

Digital edition, no ISBN.

Legal deposit: 2026

Crisis resources

If you are going through a crisis and suicidal ideation comes to you, please do not face it alone.

- 988 — 988 Suicide & Crisis Lifeline. Call or text, 24/7, free and confidential (US and Canada).
- 741741 — Crisis Text Line. Text HOME to 741741 to reach a trained crisis counselor.
- 116 123 — Samaritans, free, 24/7 (UK and Ireland).
- 911 — in case of immediate danger (US and Canada).

These numbers apply to the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Ireland. Wherever you are, findahelpline.com lists helplines country by country.

About the Author

Gildas Garrec is a practitioner specializing in cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT). Trained in integrative approaches including Young's Schema Therapy and Emotionally Focused Therapy (EFT), he works with individuals and couples facing relationship difficulties linked to insecure attachment styles.

His clinical work has led him to observe, over the course of hundreds of consultations, the recurrence of anxious dynamics in romantic relationships -- often mirroring the avoidant dynamics already described in an earlier book in this collection. This observation motivated the writing of this book, which aims to be both scientifically rigorous and practically accessible.

Website: psychologieetserenite.com

Table of Contents

- Introduction -- Why this book, why now
- PART 1 -- UNDERSTANDING THE ANXIOUS
 - Chapter 1 -- The Third Message: portrait of the anxious
 - Chapter 2 -- How attachment anxiety is built in childhood
 - Chapter 3 -- The anxious man: when male vulnerability is unsettling
 - Chapter 4 -- The anxious woman: between hypersensitivity and relational clarity
- PART 2 -- LIVING WITH ATTACHMENT ANXIETY
 - Chapter 5 -- The anxious-avoidant trap: the infernal dance, seen from the other side
 - Chapter 6 -- The 12 signs that you have anxious attachment
 - Chapter 7 -- What the anxious person experiences (and never dares to say)
 - Chapter 8 -- When the anxious person finds security (and how it goes)
- PART 3 -- BREAKING FREE AND HEALING
 - Chapter 9 -- CBT protocol for the anxious: 8 weeks of restructuring
 - Chapter 10 -- Survival guide for the anxious person's partner
 - Chapter 11 -- Couples therapy in the face of attachment anxiety
 - Chapter 12 -- Toward secure attachment: the path is possible

Bibliography

Introduction -- Why This Book, Why Now

There is a relational pattern that millions of people live through without ever managing to name it. It shows up through a series of behaviors that, seen from the outside, look excessive: rereading a message ten times before sending it, watching for the two blue ticks, reading three hours of silence as the first sign of a breakup, needing to hear "I love you" not once but repeatedly in order to settle. Someone who loves intensely, who gives a great deal, but who experiences the relationship as a string of alarms to manage rather than as a refuge.

This pattern has a name in clinical psychology: anxious attachment.

Since John Bowlby's foundational work in the 1960s and Mary Ainsworth's experimental taxonomy in the 1970s, attachment theory has evolved considerably. It has moved beyond the strictly developmental field to become one of the most robust theoretical frameworks for understanding adult romantic relationships. Research by Cindy Hazan and Phillip Shaver (1987) showed that the same attachment patterns observed in infants -- secure, anxious, avoidant -- reproduce themselves in romantic relationships, sometimes with striking fidelity.

Anxious attachment affects roughly 20% of the general population according to the most cited epidemiological studies. One person in five. Yet this attachment style remains widely misunderstood, often reduced to unflattering labels -- "clingy", "possessive", "needy" -- that obscure a perfectly identifiable, and above all changeable, psychological mechanism.

Why Now

The question of anxious attachment has become more pressing than ever, for three reasons.

First, instant messaging has turned a partner's perceived availability into a continuous stream of information to interpret. The time of last connection, the two blue ticks, the delay before a reply: so many signals that, for an anxious attachment system, become an uninterrupted source of data to decode. What used to be a silent wait (a letter that took three days to arrive) has become active, real-time surveillance -- particularly fertile ground for relational hypervigilance.

Second, dating apps have introduced a regime of intermittent reinforcement -- the unpredictable alternation between attention and silence -- which behavioral research has long identified as the most powerful pattern for maintaining a behavior, including an anxious pattern of checking and pursuit (Skinner, 1953; applied to attachment by Levine & Heller, 2010). The partner who is warm then cold, available then distant, activates precisely the system this book describes.

Third, attachment psychology is enjoying considerable renewed interest in popular culture. Books such as Attached by Levine and Heller have made the theory accessible to a general audience, and social media is awash with content about "attachment styles". This renewed interest is broadly positive, but it comes with oversimplifications that deserve correcting by a rigorous book -- in particular the tendency to present attachment anxiety as mere "insecurity" to be fixed through willpower, or worse, as a character flaw that makes the anxious person responsible for their relationship's difficulties.

What This Book Is -- and What It Is Not

This book is not a self-help book in the worn-out sense of the term. It contains no magic formulas and no promises of instant transformation. It is grounded in the scientific literature on attachment psychology, cognitive behavioral therapy, schema therapy, and affective neuroscience.

This book speaks to three distinct audiences:

Anxious individuals themselves. You may already have recognized this pattern in yourself -- that feeling of never being quite reassured, that seemingly insatiable need for validation, that fear of abandonment that colors every silence. This book will give you a structured protocol, drawn from CBT and schema therapy, to gradually transform your relationship to attachment -- without ever asking you to stop needing connection, which is a human need, not a weakness.

Partners of anxious individuals. You may feel responsible for a reassurance you can never quite produce, or overwhelmed by requests for reassurance that never seem to be enough. You need to understand what is really happening in your partner's nervous system -- not to excuse every behavior, but to distinguish what belongs to the attachment mechanism from what points to a deeper relational imbalance.

Mental health professionals. Therapists, psychologists, coaches: this book can serve as a complementary clinical resource. The cases presented, the exercises, and the 8-week protocol are directly usable in session.

The Structure of the Book

The first part (chapters 1 to 4) lays the theoretical and clinical groundwork: what anxious attachment is, how it is built in childhood, and how it shows up differently in men and women.

The second part (chapters 5 to 8) examines the anxious person in a romantic relationship: the anxious-avoidant trap seen from the other side of the mirror, the signs to recognize, the inner experience so often kept silent, and what happens when the anxious person finally meets security.

The third part (chapters 9 to 12) is resolutely oriented toward change: CBT protocol, guide for the partner, couples therapy, and the path toward secure attachment.

How to Use This Book

This book can be read from start to finish or selectively, depending on your situation:

- If you are anxious and you know it: start with chapters 1 and 6 to confirm your understanding, then go straight to chapter 9 (CBT protocol) and chapter 12 (path toward security).
- If you are the partner of an anxious person: chapters 5 (the anxious-avoidant trap), 7 (what the anxious person experiences) and 10 (survival guide) are your priorities.
- If you are not sure of your attachment style: start with the quick test in chapter 1.
- If you are a therapist: chapters 9 (CBT protocol) and 11 (couples therapy) contain tools directly usable in session.

Whatever path you take through the book, keep a notebook within reach. The exercises are not decorative -- they are the heart of the change work.

Quick reference: the three main styles

To orient your reading, here is a summary comparison table of the three main attachment styles, developed in detail in the chapters that follow.